

Special Issue on Study on Anti Domestic Violence

Call for Papers

According to the different forms of violence, domestic violence can be divided into at least four kinds: physical violence, mental violence, economic violence and sexual violence. The members involved include spouses, parents, children, cohabiting couples, and blood related family members. In the process of violence, the abuser usually beaten and verbal attack victims. This may cause death, serious injuries, minor injuries, physical pain or mental distress to the victim. Domestic violence is a very prominent social problem, and it is extremely harmful to social security, family stability and the physical and mental health of women and children. Therefore, all countries in the world should establish a more sound legal system to eliminate domestic violence.

In this special issue, we intend to invite front-line researchers and authors to submit original researches and review articles on exploring study on anti domestic violence. Potential topics include, but are not limited to:
