My gratitude goes first to my academic team with whom I co-author the book, and they are Ge Youran, Sheng Caorui, You Lei and Yuan Yao who are all the first group of researchers of climate change fiction and the Anthropocene literature in China. In 2016 I began to touch upon climate change novels and the concept of the Anthropocene which marks a turning point of my research. I applied for research project “A Study of Climate Change Fictions” and began to organize a team to start the project. And this book is the fruit of the team in the past several years. In the process of writing the book, I, Sheng, Ge, You and Yuan focus on one chapter each and then work together again. There are so many unforgettable moments when we discussed the framework of each chapter attentively and revised each draft together. Without relentless effort of my teammates this book would not have been completed.

My warm thanks go to my family. In July 2016 I paid a three-month-visit to my wife who was a visiting scholar at Harvard University. It was at that time that I began to know and get interested in the concept “Anthropocene” which turned out to be so new that it was even difficult to find an appropriate and widely accepted translation in Baidu. Undoubtedly this merely triggers greater interest, and with my deeper exploration into the concept “Anthropocene” a much broader literary as well as real world opens up before me, which transforms my cognition of the planet that we depend upon and makes me a person a stronger sense of responsibility and gratitude for the world.

Last but not least, I am indebted to the support of my friends and foreign teachers at Nanjing University of Aeronautics and Astronautics as well as the support of “the Fundamental Research Funds for the Central Universities” (No.: NR2018047).
