Special Issue on Health Behavior and Health Promotion

Call for Papers

The study of health behavior and health promotion typically involves developing and implementing evidence-based interventions to promote healthy behaviors and lifestyles. This may include identifying populations at risk for specific health conditions, developing and testing interventions aimed at changing health behaviors, and evaluating the effectiveness of these interventions. Research within this area can include investigating the social, cultural, economic, and environmental determinants of health behaviors, as well as examining the impact of health policies on behavior change. The ultimate goal of research in health behavior and health promotion is to improve overall health and well-being by reducing risk factors for illness, increasing healthy behaviors, and promoting healthy environments and policies.

In this special issue, we intend to invite front-line researchers and authors to submit original research and review articles on Health Behavior and Health Promotion. Potential topics include, but are not limited to:

- Behavioral epidemiology
- Health behavior interventions
